Jim Always Was a Loner, Even in Death

Jim Tyndell, 63, who always went his own way and never harmed anyone but himself, was found dead yesterday afternoon. His body was pulled from Indian creek where it leads into Fox river north of the Consumer company yards in North Broadway. He had been here for years but had no established address.

Jim was last seen alive Thursday afternoon by William Tosaw, clerk at the Consumers company office, 464 North Broadway, who noticed the lanky fellow pass the window. Site of the drowning was in the rear of the office below a railroad trestle which spans the creek.

It is presumed that Tyndell fell, striking his head on one of the ties, and plummeted into the water which is quite shallow at that point. The body was discovered by two young boys, Lyle McNickel, 561 New York street, and Jack Metzger, 817 New York street, who were playing along the creek.

A verdict of accidental death was returned by a coroner's jury at an inquest held by Coroner L. Victor Peterson at the Corcoran funeral home. Police have contacted a sister, Mrs. Cella Sharp, of St. Louis, Mo., regarding funeral arrangements.

CIVILIAN MORNIE.

However, that's not the story. The Hitlerian figured that the western could be stood off much than the Russians because nature of the reich's inner. The Oder line of defense; the eastern frontier were ful, but the much-sung S fortifications, backed by the Rhine, were supposed to pregnable.

Then too, the Oder is vastly nearer Berlin and th of the country than we Rhenish defenses. Actual Oder directly east of the ls only about 35 miles whereas the corresponding land fortifications were so times that distance. Cons ly a major break-through. Oder would, in theory at much more dangerous than ture of the western line.
